

The thing assigned for the first major assignment was to make your own personal definitions of the things that made of the main things that had to do with writing. I am not the best writer I am more of a speaker if I could talk instead of writing my life would be a lot easier. I am not the best at reading definitions so and I don't think I understood the prompt to a full executed what was really asked of me. Because writing that felt way harder than I made it be for myself that I how I am looking at the first part of my reflection. She gave us a list for the reflection of six prompts to choose for and I chose the ones that made the most sense to me and that I could compare the best for say. I had already thought about certain things from each prompt that would be easy for me to explain. Analyzing the test was a big part of everything and being able to explain the situation and the aspect of it all to someone that hasn't read the text. The three main things that everyone had to define were a genre, rhetorical situation, and audience.

To me writing about writing isn't that bad, I was never that good at writing as a kid or reading because of my ADHD. So this wasn't the best thing for me to do but learning more and more about the process of writing was more interesting than I thought. Just thinking about the audience you are writing to but not thinking about it is very interesting to me because I never really looked at it through that type of license. It's weird thinking about analyzing my own reading and having other people do that too. Stuff like that I don't really like it because I am not the type of person that likes to look that deep into something I worked on. But fixing the flaws of something and making it as good as you can is good at the end of the day in my opinion.

The main goal of it all was analyzing the three fundamentals into your own definition which is kinda cool. You are showing people how you see them through your eyes and let them take a peek into your own mind for a second. But at the same time, it can be kind of confusing because you are trying to reword something that is defined so many ways but the world looks at it one way and you look at it in kind of the same way but different.

When reading over everything it had to tell how my writing is and how I am formating everything because I kinda just throw everything all together and it can jump around. I write how I speak and it can be very jumpy and all of the place. I notice that I can repeat myself but not in a bad way. When I was writing about the Genre on the prompts it was more of emphasizing my point on what everything was. That's what I was doing for a lot of the things and its not a bad thing but I just saw it as repetitive but that is just how it works for me.

In all honesty, I do not think I was describing Them well and it seemed like I was comparing the things we had to read more than the main things with having to do with writing so that I one of the main things that I am going to have to work on with my paper. I was more focused on taking apart the readings and I feel like I missed one of the main things that I had to do for the readings so that was my bad. From reviewing my paper and having someone else look at it and them giving me really good feedback on what to do that is how I am going to work on it. Just like on project runway if you don't take criticism well you are going to have to bite the bullet and be sent home I really do not want to be sent home this week on this assignment.
