

My Theory Of Writing

The theory of writing I have realized that my theory of writing isn't like everyone else that seems like a no brainer but it isn't as simple as that. There are different types of writing and we all know that but we don't think about it like that and its kind of gone over my head all through my life. The way that I portray writing can be very different than the way that you do and that okay. I am trying to fit a different audience than you are and we are just trying to fulfill what is the task given to us and trying to do it in our way. The theory of writing is to me that you are trying to fit your audience and that it's going to change every time that you are trying to do something different for another audience every time you change what you are doing.

When I came into English 1001 I didn't have a theory of writing I never even really heard of a theory of writing. All I knew was how to write a paper and turn it in on the subject that the teacher gave us. I never really thought that much into it and I don't think a lot of my classmates thought about writing like that either. My theory of writing evolved more because I was writing more to an audience than really writing to just get the paper done and that's how I saw my writing at first writing to get the paper done. I had to think about more of how I was saying things in my paper like I was writing to a group of people and reading it out to them rather than just going through my normal writing motions.

The things that have contributed the most for all of this is when we were doing ask a question that cant is answered major assignment. That was one of the harder English projects that I have had to do not because It took a lot of people to do testing it was because I couldn't write it like a normal paper. I had to write it out like test results and a report I couldn't put input into and explain things in it. That was one of the weirdest types of papers iv had to do. I have never really had to write like that and was not expecting to just have to put the data down and just stop talking basically.

The relationship between the theory of writing and my created knowledge was that when I was going through this course I didn't think about how much I had to change my writing style to every assignment that we would do. The knowledge that I gained every week from reading different articles on different styles of writing and how to write in different ways and what not to do was very amazing to understand and see. Even just doing blog posts every week and not really having to have a set type of format and just writing to write was just so weird to me I don't know why. I was just so used to the MLA format for every paper in high school and having to write that over and over again. Then I come to this class and I throw all of that out the window and do things in a very relaxed way.

The way the writing of theory will apply to me throughout my times when I am not in the classroom writing a paper or doing homework is I will think more of who is reading it and how I should be writing to them more of how am I just going to get this out of paper. I am going to make it so that I am not the only one that can understand what I am writing and make it so everyone and anyone who is going to read what I am putting out will fully understand it. That's how I am going to be using what I've learned from this class and the theory of writing.
